March 2025

Local Resources

Alaska Volcano Observatory

The Alaska Volcano Observatory (AVO) monitors and studies Alaska's volcanoes to forecast and record eruptive activity and mitigate volcanic hazards. The AVO provides updates on current activity, local webcams, maps, and tips on how to prepare for an eruption.

Additionally, the AVO provides an ashfall and ash cloud forecast with predicted trajectory models of how fast ash particles will be transported in the atmosphere, how ash will interact with wind, and where ash will fallout and accumulate on the ground.

The AVO has been monitoring the continued unrest at Mount Spurr and reports that levels of seismic activity and volcanic earthquakes have elevated over the past few days. As of March 21, 2025, Mt. Spurr volcano's alert-status is currently set as an advisory, meaning the volcano is exhibiting signs of elevated unrest above known background level, with color-code yellow. In the event of a change in advisory from yellow to orange or from orange to red – the AVO will send out an alert on its website and notify its various community partners, like city and state emergency officials. You can sign up for alerts from the observatory here.
